Local Company Provides Meals for Students

Personal Touch Food Service, Inc., a local, independent food service provider, is doing its part to feed children and relieve food insecurity for those who rely on school food service during the COVID19 school closures. Personal Touch is offering meals in dozens of school districts across Western New York.

David A. Cervi, president, Personal Touch Food Service, said: "For the past 35 years, our company has been nourishing people of all ages in our community. We are working with school district leadership to make sure all children are fed during this unsettling time."

Meals are being provided at various school buildings in counties across Western New York and some districts are delivering meals by bus into neighborhoods.

"These unexpected school closures have caused disruption for families, companies, and organizations, including our own, but we are committed to meeting the needs of children who eat at school each day," Cervi said.

Personal Touch Food Service has 475 employees and provides high quality food service in businesses, residential care, higher education, and public, private, and charter schools.
